

Lamisa Parkar

MD, Group Vice President Oracle Health

Lamisa Parkar, MD, is Group Vice President of Business Strategy and Development at Oracle Health and Life Sciences, where she's responsible for shaping overall growth strategies for the business and working closely with product teams to design new solutions. A physician by training, she has spent more than 15 years in the life sciences industry, in a variety of roles including corporate strategy, product and portfolio strategy, technology and data strategy.

Most recently, Lamisa was at Mirati Therapeutics, an oncology biotech based in San Diego, where she led portfolio strategy, digital innovation and evidence generation efforts with a key focus on modernization of their clinical trial design and planning processes as well as commercial market development. Before that, she drove precision medicine and clinical informatics product strategy at McKesson and The US Oncology Network, to accelerate clinical trials and real-world research in the community.

She earned her medical degree in India from Maharashtra University of Health Sciences and her MBA from The Fuqua School of Business, Duke University. Lamisa recently moved to the greater Atlanta area where she lives with her husband, two kids and dog.

